

Lynda Jones was born in Birmingham and lived in the south of the city until her family moved to Lancashire, where she attended Darwen Grammar School near Blackburn.

Art was always her favourite subject and she hoped to become an art teacher but after her marriage she took a secretarial course and joined Birmingham City Council in their Public Health Department, later moving to the Department of Education as a school secretary. Whilst working at a secondary school she was encouraged by the head to take a certificate of education course and after gaining her qualification started a 20 year career teaching Business Studies in schools in Solihull and Birmingham until her retirement in 2003. In her final post she gained a 1st class BA honours degree in Social Sciences.

After retiring she returned to art, taking an Art Foundation course at Birmingham City University, which encouraged her to continue with her interest in the subject, and she then joined one of Pam's Art Classes.
